

ALGERIA (FRENCH)

For centuries Barbary pirates had attacked western shipping and sent slaving expeditions to Christian parts of the Mediterranean, and even further afield. Over four centuries, historians estimate that over 1 million Europeans were captured for ransom or for slavery.

Seeking to put an end to piracy, and re-establish a colonial Empire, King Charles X of France sent a military force to capture Algiers. French control was gradually extended through the coastal areas by 1848 and eventually also the Sahara region of the south by the 1930s.

The availability of cheap land (sometimes poor land bought cheaply that could be developed by modern agricultural practices, and sometimes communal land confiscated and enclosed by the French authorities) encouraged a large migration of French, Italian and Spanish settlers. By the early 1900s Europeans accounted for nearly 20% of the population.

Administration was based on the French system. Indeed, Algeria was considered technically part of France, although few native Algerians had the same rights as Europeans. Initially French revenue stamps of various categories were used to collect tax. Algerian cancels for 150 towns can be recognised by the "A" suffix after the town number.

From 1922 the colonial finances of Algeria were separated from those of France and revenue stamps inscribed ALGERIE were introduced.

In WWII Algeria remained part of Vichy France, until Allied landings were made in Algiers and Oran in 1942. The occupation of Algeria by Allied forces provoked the German occupation of Vichy France and the sending of German troops to Tunisia. Faced with a lack of supplies from France, existing revenue stamps were used up or surcharged for new rates, until the new locally printed "Marianne d'Alger" appeared in 1944.

In the aftermath of war, there was a growing awareness in Algeria that the continued French domination of the country was untenable. The FLN (National Liberation Front) began attacks from 1954 on Harkis (pro-French Arab Algerians) and on Pieds-Noirs (European Algerians) in a guerrilla war. The war ended in 1962 when Algeria gained full independence from France.

This was followed by a mass exodus of nearly 1 million Pieds Noirs and Harkis, mainly to France

ALGERIA REVENUE

These Impot du Timbre stamps played the same role as Timbre Fiscal stamps in France, being stamps for general revenue purposes. Sometimes found with postal cancels, these were not used to pay postage but derive from money order forms, telegraph receipts, or other postal documents requiring a payment and receipt.

After the liberation of Corsica in 1943, supplies of the 1930s Daussy type and the 1944 Marianne d'Alger issue were sent there for provisional use. In some cases ALGERIE was crossed out by hand, some were locally overprinted CORSE (various styles and positions), or with manuscript "Corse", while others were simply used unchanged (but can be recognised if on document, or with a clear cancel of Corsica).

1944. Daussy design of 1929 but in new bicolour style, values from 10F upwards on on lightly rose tinted paper (similar issues of 1951 are on plain white paper).

ALGERIA TABACS

From about 1907, through to about 1943 (or later?), various long series of a dozen or more were issued, each for three different categories of tobacco. In addition, various taxpays were used at times of changed rates, to show tax had been paid by the manufacturer or bonded wholesaler at an earlier date. This section is still to be written. For an earlier listing of about 350 items (some verified, some assumed from official records), see Duston.
